No prerequisites Q: How to avoid using a helper class for a generic interface I have a generic interface which has only one method which is a map function that will be used to provide the map object. I have to create two helper classes which has the map function. The reason for this is i don't want to repeat the map function code which is creating an instance of a map object. I have to create two helper classes because one of the helper classes creates a map object based on the input arguments and the other helper class creates a map object based on the output arguments of the map function. Now the problem is that i have to keep a generic interface for the map function and the map function has only one method which is the map function. If i use the normal Map interface, the map function cannot be generic. How can i avoid using the helper classes and use the map interface which can be generic. Please let me know if the question is not clear. public class A { public static T map(Function mapper) { return mapper.apply(null); } } public class B { public static T map(Function mapper) { return mapper.apply(null); } } public class C { public static T map(Function mapper) { return mapper.apply(null); }
