The aim of the present study was to examine the role of cannabinoid receptors in the anxiogenic and pharmacological actions of delta 9-tetrahydrocannabinol (delta 9-THC) and 5-(4-chloro-3-methylphenyl)-1-(4-methyl-1-piperidiny)-1H-pyrrole-3-carbonitrile (SR 141716A), an antagonist at the cannabinoid receptor. 2. Rats were trained to respond on a rapid acquisition active avoidance task and the effects of delta 9-THC, SR 141716A, and two non-cannabinoid drugs, scopolamine and mepyramine, on shock-induced suppression and escape latency, the latter as an indicator of defence behaviour, were examined. 3. A subconvulsive dose (4 mg/kg) of delta 9-THC increased escape latency, but did not alter the level of suppression produced by shock. Pretreatment with SR 141716A (5 mg/kg) blocked the anxiogenic and avoidance-impairing effects of delta 9-THC. 4. Scopolamine (1 mg/kg) and mepyramine (10 mg/kg) increased escape latency, but did not produce any changes in the level of suppression produced by shock. 5. The results suggest that there are differences between the actions of cannabinoid receptor antagonists and non-cannabinoid drugs at a behavioural level.Q: Practical application of Ramsey's Theorem I am currently reading Graham,
