Muslim kingdom. The killing of 21 people at a desert compound in January was first claimed by ISIS, but the government said Thursday it was "sectarian" and committed by a group with a Shiite background, SPA news agency reported. The suspects were apprehended in Al Hudaydah in the eastern province of Shabwa, the Interior Ministry said, adding that those detained were members of a terrorist cell that plotted to carry out more attacks. It was not immediately clear what kind of crimes the cell had planned to commit. The government initially described the killings as a "terrorist act," while the Sunni Muslim kingdom's Al Arabiya news channel quoted government spokesman Ahmed al-Assir as saying the attack was "an act of sabotage." Assir on Thursday said the killings were done by the "sectarian group," without elaborating on what that meant. Al Arabiya said that the group was "strongly committed to the extremist ideology of Daesh and have a history of training and conducting the attacks in Shabwa," using a common Arabic acronym for the Islamic State group. "The incident was meant to be a show of support for Daesh," Al Arabiya reported, citing unnamed security sources. Saudi authorities regularly arrest and detain people with suspected links to the kingdom's Shiite
