In a whiteboard or the like, a user may write on the surface with a marker, a stick, or the like in order to record an outline of a viewable object. However, in such a case, the user may make writing during the view time of the object. Therefore, when the user is transferred to another view position, the outline of the viewable object may be scattered. Accordingly, in the drawing process, the outline may be interpolated. In particular, when the object to be drawn is a curve and the position and the direction of the curve are changed, the outline may be disordered and not drawn in a correct direction. In this case, the outline may be drawn by calculating the contour of the curve and correcting the outline. However, in such a case, it takes a lot of calculation time to calculate the contour of the curve. In order to reduce the calculation time, technologies have been proposed in the related art. For example, a technology is known which a new contour line is calculated from given contour data and a direction vector of the contour is calculated based on the new contour line and the contour data of a curve before new contour line is calculated (see PTL 1). In PTL 1, the contour data and the direction vector of the curve are calculated, and then, a point is calculated based on the contour line and the direction vector. At this time, if the position of the point is outside the drawing region, a line is drawn in the drawing region which has the point as the end point and the first point of the contour line is interpolated. In the drawing process of PTL 1, the first point of the contour line is interpolated at a first time.
