SourceAnalysis of the electromagnetic properties of surfaces with a grating of conductive nanowires. The conductivity of metallic nanowires allows for the construction of non-reflecting surfaces. We demonstrate here the use of such a surface in an antenna for radio-frequency sensing, and show that the sensing capability is unaffected by the presence of the metal. We compare the performance of the antenna with that of the same antenna made entirely of a metal deposited by sputtering. This demonstration of the use of a conductive nanowire grating on metal substrates is of interest for the study of surface-enhanced Raman spectroscopy, where an enhancement in the signal is observed. The fabrication of the conductive nanowire grating on conventional metal mirrors will be the key to the fabrication of these new types of optical, sensing, and photonic devices.
