EU mulls firing first shot to curb the shady business of Facebook and Google The European Union's antitrust watchdog is set to begin a probe into Facebook and Google to establish whether they are unfairly promoting their businesses, the Financial Times reported Wednesday. The EU's competition authority is considering launching a case against the social network and the search giant, according to four sources familiar with the investigation, Reuters reported on Wednesday. The probe, which will be carried out by the European competition enforcer, is to be announced as early as next week, one source told AFP. The focus of the investigation is on businesses like Facebook and Google's AdWords advertising platform. A case could see the EU's competition authority to fine the firms for unfair practices, potentially the biggest anti-trust sanction the bloc has handed out. The sources said the probe would focus on charges that Google is giving its AdSense service a commercial advantage through bundling it with Android, the operating system used by smartphones. The two companies have already been hit with punitive fines by the bloc for other anti-trust violations in the past. The AdSense and Android case was originally opened in 2013 by the European Commission, but one source said that the probe had now been reopened in the wake of several major scandals at both firms. A spokesman for the commission's competition department did not reply to an email seeking comment. Facebook is accused of pressuring app developers to give it a share of revenues when their users click on ads shown to them on the social network. Google's AdWords platform is based on the same business model as Facebook but the two internet giants continue to dominate the advertising market. The EU's investigation could be as much as a year long, the sources said. The EU's two largest economies, France and Germany, along with the EU executive Commission, could hold a preliminary hearing on the matter as early as January, one source said. Washington to subsidize EU Security Agency The European Commission and its new US counterpart, the Department of Homeland Security, reached an agreement Wednesday to strengthen cooperation in fighting cyber attacks and improving the protection of US government secrets. The Commission and DHS will discuss issues ranging from cybersecurity to how they will tackle cyber threats and trade secrets. The EU executive will also transfer the EU's border agency Frontex to the Department of Homeland Security, in a deal that will also see the US agency take over the staffing of EU's

Spontaneous apoptosis of cultured rat cortical neurons mediated by autocatalytic caspases. Caspases are postulated to be central mediators of programmed cell death (PCD) in vertebrates. In the brain, TUNEL staining is a useful method to identify apoptosis in the brain. In this study, we established cell cultures of rat cerebral cortex. These neurons died spontaneously in the absence of exogenous stimuli. The dead cells were positive for terminal deoxynucleotidyl transferase-mediated dUTP-biotin nick end labeling (TUNEL), TUNEL-positive cells were identified as apoptotic cells by staining with 3-methyladenine (3-MA) which blocks the autocatalytic activation of caspases. Caspase-3 like protease which was identified by 5-color flow cytometric assay (FACS) analysis, was not involved in the process of PCD in neurons.Q: Custom Profile Fields Behaving Strangely In my WordPress theme I added a list of custom profile fields, which works and displays correctly on the user edit profile screen. However, one of these fields in particular acts a bit strangely. When users press submit their settings, their first field is empty, then the second, third, fourth, etc. fields are populated in order. I am using the example code from: A: It sounds like your custom profile fields are using the profile_fields_values_add_profile_field.php hook to add your custom fields to the profile edit screen. You may find that they're being stored in the database in an order other than you might expect. If you're calling the values via get_user_meta, you'll need to use the array passed to that function to get the order. You'll then need to create and populate a new array with the values in the right order. Surgical Management of Osteoporotic Proximal Femoral Fractures. Osteoporotic fractures of the proximal femur commonly occur in elderly patients. In a younger patient with an osteoporotic fracture, surgery is indicated for fracture stability and to preserve hip function. When a surgically treated osteoporotic femoral fracture is unstable, the risk of serious complications is increased. These complications include further hip fracture, infection,
