The invention relates to a method of producing a multilayer laminate in strip-like form in which a fiber material is provided with a coating, in which the coating is bonded to a carrier material, and the carrier material is wound into a roll and cut to the desired length, where in the further processing operation the coating is removed from the carrier material by mechanical stripping and is deposited to the desired extent on the fiber material. For the production of so-called cushion strips with a foam coating, it is a known practice to wind up the carrier material in the form of a strip, cut the roll along the outer circumference, remove the coating from the carrier material by mechanical stripping, and apply it to the surface of the foam material. After the foam and coating have cooled, the individual strips are connected to one another by means of a tie, for example, by bonding by means of ultrasonic bonding (EP 0 765 671 B1). EP 0 802 255 B1 relates to a process in which strips are wound up in a certain profile shape and brought to the desired dimensions, cut, and then rolled onto a cooling drum. The individual strips are separated from one another, and the coating applied to the foam material is removed by means of mechanical stripping. U.S. Pat. No. 6,143,439 relates to a process in which a strip is unwound, rolled, and the coating removed by mechanical stripping. Then, the individual strips are removed and combined to one another. In this case, the adhesion between the foam material and the coating is achieved by means of a coating with a hardener, and the carrier material has a predetermined breaking force. All the processes are laborious and require a lot of technical effort. In particular, for the bonding of the foamed material to the carrier material, a certain surface tension, predetermined adhesive force, and adhesive quality must be controlled.
